Persuasive signs: The semiotics of advertising

The field of semiotics, too, has been extremely active in stimulating interest among semioticians, advertisers, and the public at large in the various signifying aspects of advertising. So, another semiotic work on this [over-studied] topic would seem to be needless, if not irrelevant, to increasing our understanding of advertising as a form of persuasive rhetoric.

To this end, it is argued that semiotics allows for the practical distinction of persuasion from manipulation in marketing communication. Because signs are as volatile as they are powerful, understanding the semiotic structure of the communication is crucial: some message will almost surely be transmitted in a powerful way, whether it is the one that was intended or not.
